College Park, MD: A new PIPA/Knowledge Networks poll finds that a strong majority of Americans has rallied in support of the President's decision to go to war with Iraq, despite the lack of UN approval. Nonetheless, the public feels that in the future the UN should play a major role in international affairs, including governing post-war Iraq.

Seventy-five percent say they support the President's decision to go to war with Iraq, with 54% saying they agree with the decision and 21% saying they support the president even though they do disagree with the decision.

But Americans do not appear to believe that the US should regard the choice to go to war without UN approval as a precedent. Asked, "Do you think that in the future the US should or should not feel more free to use military force without UN authorization?" only 29% said that it should, while 66% said that it should not.

Steven Kull, director of PIPA comments, "While the public is ready to give the president a pass this time, it appears that in the future, two-thirds will still insist on getting UN approval for the use of military force."

Americans also do not believe that UN's failure to authorize going to war with Iraq has undermined its future importance. Only 26% anticipate that in the future the UN will have a less important role in the world while 71% said that it will be at least as important as before the war.

Asked who should govern Iraq in the aftermath of the war, only 30% said it should be the US, while 52% said it should be the UN, and 14% gave other answers.

Strong majorities want the UN, not the US, to take the lead in dealing with North Korea (72%) and Iran (63%). Steven Kull comments, “There is no evidence that the majority of Americans believe that the UN has become irrelevant.”

Americans show a moderate level of confidence that the decision to go to war was the right one. Asked to answer on a scale of 0 to 10, with 0 being certain that it was the wrong decision, 10 being certain that it was the right decision, and 5 being unsure, 59% gave a score above 5 and 27% gave a response of 10. The mean score was 6.32.

Many more Americans believe that the US going to war with Iraq will have negative consequences for US foreign policy than believe it will have positive consequences. More believe that it will increase the likelihood that that North Korea will make nuclear weapons, that feelings in the Muslim world toward the US will worsen, that the risk of terrorist attacks will increase, and that it will be harder for the US to get cooperation from other countries.

A strong majority (63%) favors trying to limit the number of Iraqi civilian casualties even if this means the war would last longer.

Though only a minority would prefer to see the US govern post-war Iraq, an overwhelming majority (85%) says the US has the responsibility to remain in Iraq until there is a stable government, which the median respondent estimates will take 2 years. An overwhelming majority (86%) thinks it is important to bring democracy to Iraq and a strong majority (63%) believes this will eventually occur.

It does not appear that the support for war with Iraq has generalized to become broader support for a confrontational approach with North Korea and Iran. Almost four out of five respondents—79%--said “the US should deal with the government of North Korea primarily by trying to build better relations,” while only 15% said the US should emphasize an approach of “pressuring it with implied threats that the US may use military force against it.” Asked the same question about Iran, an overwhelming 80% thought the US should deal with the Iranian government by trying to build better relations, and just 16% preferred to pressure it with implied military threats.

The poll was conducted with a nationwide poll of 795 American adults over March 22-25, 2003. The margin of error was plus or minus 3.5%. The poll was fielded using by Knowledge Networks using its nationwide panel, which is randomly selected from the entire adult population and subsequently provided internet access.
